

Why would the FCC advocate to weaken a law? Perhaps they don't mind being interrupted at any time during the day or night by telephone calls which, are unsolicited. How can telemarketers have more rights than private citizens? If you do weaken the law, how about forcing them to have their telephone numbers show..none of them do. They are all "unknown". I'd like to know who they are so I can block their numbers one by one if necessary. But I'm not sure why I should have to go through all of this trouble when there is a perfectly good law in place to protect my privacy. Even with the law, phone calls continue to be placed though not nearly as frequently. I sincerely hope you reconsider your position and leave well-enough alone.
